As 2021 marks another year of ongoing racist, ableist, queerphobic violence toward Black, Indigenous, and many other communities of colour, there are even more reasons to center justice, equity, and community in our research aims, questions, approaches, and commitments. This panel invites four brilliant BIPOC speakers from across the University to share their ongoing research particularly in relation to their communities. Diverse though their disciplinary backgrounds are, the speakers have in common their strong commitment to thinking with, about, and for their varying relations in the face of violence against racialized, queer, and disabled communities.
